

Quantity is quality in an elementary condition. Thus the mind measures the physical world, but that world is a qualitative concept.

It is the qualitative reaction to a thing which gives meaning to its quantitative existence. The quantitative would have no existence without our senses which create the quantitative cosmos for us. The psychological judgment (or discernment) creates the world of form and measurement from which it further extracts psychological or qualitative meaning.

The physical sense is a psychological construct